Major Renovations in Campus Mail

After months of disappointing business, Virginia Tech campus mail has announced a serious change to their mail offices. The AJ Mailroom will maintain its current location but will be renamed the AJ "Maleroom" in an effort to attract more customers. The AJ Maleroom will establish a YMCA-esque program to allow young men at Virginia Tech to get themselves clean, have a good meal, and do whatever they feel. Current plans include the installation of a big screen TV and a hot tub, along with the addition of several young female maleroom attendants. Other amenities such as a comic book library and a steak vending machine are still in the works.

Participation in the new maleroom will be by invitation only. Guys, watch for a golden ticket (and by golden ticket I mean yellow slip) in your malebox. A preview ticket read:

"Congratulations! You are hereby invited to the newly renovated AJ Maleroom! Feel free to drop by to see our new amenities and to compare your package with others on campus."

There is no estimated date of completion for the renovation because campus officials are postponing a grand opening until they can find a homonym for the word 'female'.

Candy? Can-DO!

Greetings, fellow ghosts and ghouls. I hope you've all had a safe and satisfying All Hallow's Eve. Thanks to Blacksburg's clever weather, it should have seemed just warm enough to warrant that Sexy Vampire Nurse teddy at the start of Wednesday evening, and then dropped below freezing as soon as you were too far away to change. You win again, Blacksburg!

But, enough about Will Satterwhite's frigid Halloween. What I'd really like to talk to you about is the proper way to dispose of all that excess candy you've probably accumulated over the past week. Now, the obvious answer would be to eat it, but how selfish would that be? In light of the recent success of the fantastic date auction, it seems to me that Hillcrest's overflowing philanthropic nature must be capitalized on! So here is my solution: send the candy to war-ridden countries.

It's a scientific fact that candy makes people happy. Happy people don't blow stuff up. Therefore, sending candy to the war zones will help promote world peace. Not only would we be increasing happiness, but we'd simultaneously be solving any sort of hunger problems in the area! Sure, maybe they don't have bread... but let them eat candy!

All those who support this course of action are encouraged to package up all that delicious chocolatey goodness, and share the love. For a complete list of war zones (and any other place that might benefit from candy due to excessive terrorists, natural disasters or democrats.) see www.foxnews.com.

Kathleen Cooperstein is willing to share all her sweet stuff... if you know what she means...

OLD HOKIE

As we all know, old people complain. "Oh! My aching back!" "I'm small and wrinkly" "EPAaaaaaaa" etc., etc. The Hillpress has just discovered two ancient VT alumni, Etta and Rose Stone, who have made it possible for us to finally understand the meaning behind all that griping. This newspaper can exclusively reveal that many old people are not actually being snarky, but are in fact reminiscing about all the wonderful time they spent at old VPI.

How can you tell if they're alum? Here are a few key phrases that indicate old Hokie-dom

"When I was your age, I had to walk uphill to class, both ways, in the snow." This bit of whinery actually describes the trek to McBryde and back to the academic side of campus. Plus, it was the ice age, so everything was pretty much frozen.

"In my day, women didn't walk around dressed like THAT!" How true! The original colors were black and grey. Women only began dressing in orange and maroon when VT's colors were changed to be less prison-like.

"It used to rain cats and dogs." Prior to the advent of Bob Barker, billions of un-spayed and un-neutered cats and dogs roamed the VT campus. Combine that with the typical Blacksburg 60 mph winds and viola, fluffy precipitation!

"Young people showed more respect for their elders." With old VT's cadets, everyone was forced to show respect for their superior officers. Thanks to the civilian students, young people can show everyone the [Hokie] bird.

Erin Rubin doesn't like old people because they're too foldy.

Glennon's Performance Reaches beyond the Field

Last Thursday night was an affirmation that it's not over 'til it's over. The stadium watched in utter disbelief as the Eagles mounted one of the most stunning comebacks of the season.

Some people are blaming the Virginia Tech secondary for lackluster coverage. Others are pointing the finger at Bud Foster for adjusting to a prevent defense for the last two drives. Sure, maybe we would have done better if we kept rushing five instead of three, but we all know why we lost that game. Sean Glennon.

Sean Glennon was solely responsible for the collapse of the Hokie defense last Thursday. His poor quarterbacking skills have caused the team countless problems. Clearly, if Tyrod Taylor had started at QB the whole season we would still be undefeated. LSU wouldn't have stood a chance against the untested true freshman.

I am willing to forgive Sean for his inadequate athleticism, but a chilling new study released this past Monday suggests that Glennon's tenure is also contributing to global warming. Statisticians working closely with the athletics department started monitoring the trend last season, shortly after he threw a fifteen yard shovel pass to a UVA linebacker.

Virginia Tech football coach Frank Beamer was unavailable for comment, but Al Gore has already denounced Glennon, advocating more environmentally-friendly players like Xavier Adibi and Brandon Flowers. Gore plans to speak at next weekend's Orange Effect game to spread awareness of this new phenomenon.

Tory Smith is a card-carrying liberal with a long record of environmental whistle-blowing.
